

The last days of Pompeii

It was a busy, everyday morning in the streets of beautiful Pompeii when people were heading to their daily work. On the roads, kids were playing, in a bakery people were buying loaves of bread and everything was going well. The inhabitants were not warned about the following disaster. Suddenly, the volcano erupted and lava burst on the top of Mount Vesuvius. Everyone was in panic, the fire was spreading all over the city of Pompeii and buildings were collapsing. People tried to escape this tragedy by running to the sea but only a few were rescued. This destruction caused the loss of human life and property and many citizens went missing. It was very hard for people to survive since the eruption was unforeseen. This is the tragical reason, why the historical city of Pompeii in southern Italy was destroyed.

It was a busy, everyday morning in the streets of beautiful Pompeii at least that's what the people thought. As always the children were playing, the adults were shopping and the shop owners were as busy as always. And then all of the sudden the explosion went off. People were running, children were crying looking for their parents and everyone was trying to get away as fast as possible. The volcano gave warning signs long before the first explosion, but not everyone had the necessary experience to know what was coming. And now with volcanic stones and layers of ashes falling on them, for most of them there was no escape. The lucky ones evacuated by sea as fast as possible and they lived on to tell the tale. When the lava finally reached them, Pompeii once a thriving city, was now a ghost town. The lava preserved what was left from the city and its people, until it was found once again centuries later, and unlocked its secrets once again.

It was a busy, everyday morning in the streets of Pompeii... The people were all having a nice day, some walking along the streets and their gardens, some at home doing chores like cooking and cleaning, all the children were playing together outside, and some were also at work. All of a sudden, the earth started shaking, and the giant, for years non-eruptive, volcano, erupted with scorching-hot lava from its top. The lava very quickly spread like wild-fire. From the streets, to all the crops, and it even damaged local housing. Everyone panicked and ran for their lives. However, a lot of people weren't so lucky, as there was a lot of loss of human life during the eruption, even if there were some survivors. That was the tragic end of the city of Pompeii.

It was a busy, everyday morning in the streets of beautiful Pompeii everybody was happy. There were children playing in the streets, their parents working in their workshop and little stray animals begging for food as always. But suddenly, there was a tremendous earthquake which had the people of the city terrified. The sky changed color, it became dark and grey clouds covered the beautiful blue sky. And then the volcano near Pompeii, erupted and lava and fire spread all over the city. Every inhabitant was in panic, trying to get away but the lava swept them away. Houses started to collapse and so many people were burned alive. The next day after the big tragedy, the people that survived went back to maybe find the missing people that were swept away. The city was destroyed and everything was covered by layers of ashes. The people of Pompeii were devastated.
